Money was tighter in Washington during the week than in New York, which means that there was a greater demand for it here. Investment businesses were stimulated, principally in the sales of real estate.

Banking conditions were more avorable. Deposits increased during the period, due, undoubtedly, to larger receipts of money in this country from abroad.

From abroad.

Several circumstances arising during the week had rather a cooling effect on markets outside of Washington. The strikes at Bridgeport, Conn., and Bayonne, N. J., made investors a little more timid, as it was felt such disaffection might spread. The situation in Europe also is resulting in the marking of time by the big financial markets, even though the markets were braced up by the placing of large war orders in this country.—It probably is felt mow that the war will be drawn out, which is producing a feeling of indecision and uncertainty in the markets control.

He broke into the big top in 1907, when he played with Pitts-burgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis in the National League. He was one of the leading batters of the pill for an average of .304 that year. Early in the 1912 season he broke a leg. The fracture incapacitated him almost all of that season, and when he reported to Frank Chance the following year he made a very poor showing. He was not only unable to cover the bases with his former speed, but his batting eye was also sadly afflicted, and he fell off in base stealing and fielding to such an extent that Chance released him. Wolter refused to accept the theory that his playing days were over, and with the Los Angeles team he soon demonstrated that he had recovered his old-time form.
